From the National Intelligencer. Treasury Forms.

A paragraph is going the rounds of the public press hundreds of millions of dollars as Secretary of the Treasury, retired from that office as poor as a primi tive Christian. We are induced to notice this paragraph solely with a view to correct the very general helief that prevails that a Secretary of the Treasury has the handling of the public money, wher he never touches a dollar of it, and cannot even draw his own salary without the previous consent and signature of four other officers of the Treasury, viz: the Comptroller, Auditor, Treasurer, and Register.

Every demand or account against the United States is first presented to the proper auditor, (of whom there are six,) with all the papers and vouchers, who fully examines it in all its bearings, and disallows any item that is irregular or not supported by proper vouchers. He then fills up a printed blank certifying the amount due, &c , and passes it, with all the papers, to the proper comptroller, (of whom there are two,) and, if found correct as passed by the auditor, the comptroller certifies the same, and it then goes to the register for record. From him it is pass appropriation to meet the demand; and if so, he fills | width two and a half miles. up a blank mandate or warrant, to be signed by the Secretary, and addressed to the Treasurer of the United States, directing him to pay A. B. such an amount, for such an object, and out of such an appropriation. This warrant has then to go to the Comptroller to be examined and signed by him, and its 7th volume, on the 5th day of the same month. then again to the Register for examination and most convenient to the party receiving the money .-But the forms do not end here. This check must go to the Register to be examined and compared with his previous record, and, if correct, he countersigns it, and it is returned to the Treasurer, who hands it to the proper owner, taking his receipt for the same.

Confidential clerks are selected in each Department as disbursing agents, to pay salaries and other expenses of the Departments or of their separate bureaus. Towards the close of each month these disbursing agents make a requisition for the amount required to pay the salaries and other expenses, designating generally the different items. To obtain this requisition it must go through all the above forms, requiring the signatures of the Secretary. Comptroller, Auditor, Register, and Treasurer; and when the check of the latter is given the money is not actually drawn, but the check is simply deposited to the credit of the disbursing agent, the cashier of the Treasury thus merely removing that sum from | by the consciousness that our efforts are appreciated. the general mass of money in the Treasury to the intitled to salaries or other demands, and those checks usefulness. are charged to him; and his account is kept by the Treasurer on precisely the same basis as individuals keep their accounts with incorporated banking institutions, the deposites and checks being regularly entered in a bank book. It is from this disbursing balance must correspond with the sum to his credit said office. with the Treasurer's cashier. These accounts and vouchers are all passed upon the same as other accounts by the Auditor. &c., and settled in conformity with the books of the Treasury.

It is not at all unusual that, in the settlement of accounts at the Treasury, a balance is found to be due parties for less than a dollar, the warrant for the payment of which small sum must go through all the preceding forms before the money can be obtained day of August next. from the vaults; and we recollect hearing a former Secretary say that on one occasion, when signing a batch of warrants, he had just put his signature to one for nearly a million of dollars, and the next succeeding one was for twenty-seven cents. This might be called " from the sublime to the ridiculous."

It is another proof added to many others of the superior genius of Hamilton, that all the present system, forms, checks, and balances of the Treasury been made, though no doubt many have been suggested or attempted, upon his original plan.
